

New Zealand

Eleanor Ainge Roy in Dunedin

@EleanorAingeRoy

Tue 14 May 2019 14:24 AEST

7,142

New Zealand 'people's budget' sees Ardern put billions more into health and education

Read more

This article is more than 1 year old

New Zealand's world-first 'wellbeing' budget to focus on poverty and mental health

Country claims to be the first to measure success by people's wellbeing

While New Zealand's economy is thriving, many people have been left behind. Photograph: Murdo Macleod/The Guardian

Child poverty, domestic violence and mental health will be the priorities in New Zealand's "wellbeing budget", the finance minister has announced, with the nation declaring itself the first in the world to measure success by its people's wellbeing.

On Tuesday Grant Robertson said that despite New Zealand's "rockstar" economy many New Zealanders were being left behind, with home ownership at a 60-year low, the suicide rate climbing and homelessness and food aid grants on the rise.

According to predictions by the International Monetary Fund, the New Zealand economy is expected to grow at around 2.5% in 2019 and 2.9% in 2020. But Robertson emphasised many New Zealanders were not benefitting in their daily lives.

Although comparable countries such as the UK have begun to measure the national rate of wellbeing, New Zealand is the first western country to design its entire budget around wellbeing priorities and instruct its ministries to design policies to improve wellbeing.

"Sure, we had - and have - GDP growth rates that many other countries around the world envied, but for many New Zealanders, this GDP growth had not translated into higher living standards or better opportunities," Robertson said. "How could we be a rockstar, they asked, with homelessness, child poverty and inequality on the rise?"

The 2019 budget will be handed down on 30 May.

"For me, wellbeing means people living lives of purpose, balance and meaning to them, and having the capabilities to do so," said Robertson.

"This gap between rhetoric and reality, between haves and have-nots, between the elites and the people, has been exploited by populists around the globe."

Robertson cited a cultural rehabilitation program for Māori high-security prisoners, aimed at reducing high rates of recidivism and reoffending, as the kind of project that would be prioritised in the budget.

The opposition National party has criticised the budget as being out of touch with New Zealanders' values, and said what Kiwis really needed to improve their lives was better infrastructure and public services.

"According to this framework the government's put in place, making a new friend is almost twice as valuable as not having to go to the emergency department," said the National party's spokeswoman on finance, Amy Adams, earlier in the year.

"Or getting on better with your neighbours is twice as valuable as avoiding diabetes - I just think it starts to become a nonsense,"

The Kingdom of Bhutan kickstarted the global wellbeing focus with the introduction of the Gross National Happiness Index in 2008, measuring things such as psychological health, living standards, community vitality and environmental and cultural resilience to inform government policy making.

But despite the index, the country remains a "least developed country" and the unemployment rate is rising. Bhutan also ranks 96 spots below the world's happiest country, Finland, as defined by the UN in its annual World Happiness Report.

Since you're here ...

... joining us from New Zealand, we have a small favour to ask. You've read 149 articles in the last year. And you're not alone; millions are flocking to the Guardian for open, independent, quality news every day, and readers in 180 countries around the world now support us financially.

We believe everyone deserves access to information that's grounded in science and truth, and analysis rooted in authority and integrity. That's why we made a different choice: to keep our reporting open for all readers, regardless of where they live or what they can afford to pay.

The Guardian has no shareholders or billionaire owner, meaning our reporting is free from the interests of any one person or company.

Ainge Roy, 2019a

Most viewed

Live Trump's allies and family rally to his defense on first night of Republican convention - live

California wildfire death toll up to seven as huge blazes burn on

'Dead' woman discovered alive in body bag at funeral home

John Oliver on Trump's border wall: 'Stupidier than I thought was possible'

Danbury, Connecticut will name sewage plant after John Oliver

Our editorial independence and autonomy allows us to provide fearless investigations and analysis of those with political and commercial power. We can give a voice to the oppressed and neglected, and help bring about a brighter, fairer future. Your support protects this.

Supporting us means investing in Guardian journalism for tomorrow and the years ahead. The more readers funding our work, the more questions we can ask, the deeper we can dig, and the greater the impact we can have.

We're determined to provide reporting that helps each of us better understand the world, and take actions that challenge, unite, and inspire change. So we seek your support not simply to survive, but to grow our ambitions and sustain our model for open, independent journalism.

If there were ever a time to join us, and help accelerate our growth, it is now. You have the power to support us through these challenging economic times and enable real-world impact.

Every contribution, however big or small, makes a difference. Support us today from as little as NZ$1 - it only takes a minute. Thank you.

Support the Guardian →

Remind me in October

VISA  # PayIt

Topics
New Zealand
Asia Pacific / news

Reuse this content

Most popular

World ► Europe US Americas Asia Australia Middle East Africa Inequality Global development

News Opinion Sport Culture Lifestyle

Sign up to our daily email

Sign up

About us

Information

Contact us

SecureDrop

Vacancies

Privacy settings

Privacy policy

Cookie policy

Terms & conditions

Help

All topics

All writers

Events

Digital newspaper archive

Facebook

Twitter

Guardian Labs

Advertise with us

Search UK jobs

Discount Codes

Back to top ^