New Zealand’s world-first ‘wellbeing’ budget to focus on poverty and mental health

Country claims to be the first to measure success by people’s wellbeing

A photo shows a group of people in a field, with text overlay: "Child poverty, domestic violence and mental health will be the priorities in New Zealand’s ‘wellbeing budget’, the finance minister has announced, with the nations declaring itself the first in the world to measure success by its people’s wellbeing.

On Tuesday Grant Robertson said that despite New Zealand’s ‘redstar’ economy, many New Zealanders were being left behind, with home ownership at a 60-year low, the suicide rate climbing and homelessness and food aid grants on the rise.

According to predictions by the International Monetary Fund, the New Zealand economy is expected to grow at around 1.3% in 2019 and 2.0% in 2020. But Robertson emphasised many New Zealanders were not benefiting in their daily lives.

Although comparable countries such as the UK have begun to measure the national rate of wellbeing, New Zealand is the first western country to design its entire budget around wellbeing priorities and instruct its ministers to design policies to improve wellbeing.

"Sure, we had... and have... GDP growth rates that many other countries around the world envied, but for many New Zealanders, this GDP growth had not translated into higher living standards or better opportunities." Robertson said. "How could we be a rockstar, they asked, with homelessness, child poverty and inequality on the rise?"

The 2020 budget will be handed down on 13 May.

"For me, wellbeing means people living lives of purpose, balance and meaning, and having the capability to do so," said Robertson.

"This gap between rhetoric and reality between have and have-nots, between the elites and the people, has been exploited by populists around the globe." Robertson cited a cultural rehabilitation program for hides, high security prisoners, aimed at reducing high rates of recidivism and recidivism, as the kind of project that would be prioritised in the budget.

The opposition National party has criticized the budget as being out of touch with New Zealand’s values, and said what it’s really needed to improve their lives was better infrastructure and public services.

"According to this framework the government’s put in place, making a new friend is about twice as valuable as not having to go to the emergency department," said the National party’s spokeswoman on finance, Amy Adams, earlier in the year.

"Or getting on better with your neighbours is twice as valuable as avoiding diabetes - I just think it starts to become a nonsense."

The Kingdom of Shatan introduced the global wellbeing index with the introduction of the Gross National Happiness Index in 2008, measuring things such as psychological health, living standards, community vitality and environmental and cultural resilience to inform government policy making.

But despite the index, the country remains a “least developed country” and the unemployment rate is rising. Shatan also sits 68 spots below the world’s happiest country, Finland, as defined by the UN in its annual World Happiness Report.

Since you’re here...

... joining us from New Zealand, we have a small favour to ask. You’ve read 149 articles in the last year. And you’re not alone: millions are flocking to the Guardian for open, independent, quality news every day, and readers in 200 countries around the world now support us financially.

We believe everyone deserves access to information that’s grounded in science and truth, and analysis rooted in authority and integrity, and that’s why we made a different choice: to keep our reporting open for all readers, regardless of where they live or what they can afford to pay.

The Guardian has no shareholders or billionaire owners, meaning our journalism can remain truly independent. Our newsroom is free from any commercial or political influence, and has a strict policy of editorial independence. Politicians and advertisers play no part in our journalism.

Because we value your support, we have put in place a subscription offer to allow you to continue to access all our quality journalism. For as little as $1, you can support the Guardian’s journalism and maintain its independence. Please click below to sign up.

Read more
Our editorial independence and autonomy allow us to provide fearless investigations and analysis of those with political and commercial power. We can give a voice to the oppressed and neglected, and help bring about a brighter, fairer future. Your support protects this.

Supporting us means investing in Guardian journalism for tomorrow and the years ahead. For more readers funding our work, the more questions we can ask, the deeper we can dig, and the greater the impact we can have. We're determined to provide reporting that helps each of us better understand the world, and take actions that challenge, unite, and inspire change. So we seek your support not simply to survive, but to grow our ambitions and sustain our model for open, independent journalism.

If there were ever a time to join us, and help accelerate our growth, this is now. You have the power to support us through these challenging economic times and enable real-world impact.

Every contribution, however big or small, makes a difference. Support us today from as little as NZ$1. It only takes a minute. Thank you.

Support the Guardian

Remind me in October

Most popular

World > Europe > US > Americas > Asia > Australia > Middle East > Africa > Inequality > Global development

News Opinion Sport Culture Lifestyle

Sign up to our daily email

Sign up

About us
Information
Contact us
Sponsored Vacancies
Privacy settings
Privacy policy
Cookie policy
Terms & conditions
Help

All topics
All writers
Events
Digital newspaper Archive
Facebook
Twitter

Guardian Ltd
Advertise with us
Search UK jobs
Discount Codes

Back to top

© 2020 Guardian News & Media Limited or its affiliated companies. All rights reserved. Guardian.