The most famous balance of payments crisis in the second half of the 20th century occurred in late 1957. Arnold Nordmeyer was the minister of finance in the recently elected Labour government. He attempted to deal with the crisis by reducing demand for overseas goods through imposing additional duties on cars, alcohol and tobacco. In a strict economic sense this was a logical response to the situation, but politically it was a disaster and the Labour Party was saddled with the memory of Nordmeyer’s ‘black budget’ for the next decade. Nordmeyer is shown here on 26 June 1958, just hours before delivering the budget.

About this item
Alexander Turnbull Library, Dominion Post Collection (PAColl-7327)

Permission of the Alexander Turnbull Library, National Library of New Zealand, Te Puna Mātauranga o Aotearoa, must be obtained before any re-use of this image.

How to cite this page:
Story by C. John McDermott and Rishab Sethi, published 11 Mar 2010