How the Polynesian Panthers gave rise to Pasifika activism

2.34pm on 18 June 2016
Keni Vaka'uta - kennivaka@tradion.co.nz (invoke kennivaka@tradion.co.nz)

A group credited with fighting racism against Pacific people in New Zealand, and putting them on the map politically, celebrated 45 years this week.

As the Polynesian Panthers marked the occasion with the blessing of a plaque in the Auckland suburb of Parnell, some of the same issues which drove the group's creation remain relevant in New Zealand society today.

The Polynesian Panthers were established in Auckland in June 1971 by six young Pacific Island men: Fred Schmidt, Nonoa Tearoe, Paul Dipp, Vaughan Sand, Eddie Williams and Will Tolohia.

In its early days, the group worked on political activism, running food co-ops and homework centres, advocating for tenants and promoting Pacific languages, and served as a forerunner for much modern-day community activism.

Mr Tolohia, a founder of the Wealtsi Artist Trust and the chair of the Pacific Island Media Association, said the group was modelled on a prominent group within the American civil rights movement, the Black Panther Party.

He had read the book 'Sete the Time by Black Panther Party chairman Bobby Seale and seen similarities to what was happening in New Zealand, he said.

"So that was the reason we set up. We had a mixture of ex-gang members and university students and what not," he said.

Direct action

Mr Tolohia said the group realised race-related problems in Anterion needed direct action to be solved.

Reverend Wayne Tuleaia, who is now a member of the Northern Presbytery Council, joined the group and became its 'Information Minister'.

"You know it's wrong that we should be addressed as 'black bastards' and that kind of thing, so we started to push back," Mr Tuleaia explained.

The United States' problems with racism at the time had been well documented, he said it was also an issue in New Zealand.
"Here we are, the weakest group in society, we're being victimised and so we have to fight back, if you like. And that's the thinking of 16-year-olds and 17-year-olds, which is what we were, and we thought 'we're doing the right thing'."

Reverend Muu Strickson-Pua attended an early homework centre run by the Panthers.

He said the leadership inspired the urban youth of Auckland, and the infamous dawn raids further highlighted the need for such a group.

The Polynesian Panther Party was founded in Auckland in 1971. Photo: Facebook

"New Zealand's history of the way it treated Samoans and Tongans at that time... Our people had door-knocking by the police, dogs going through, people having to line up on Parnell Road, K Road (Karangahape Road)," Rev Strickson-Pua said.

"If you were brown, you were stopped by the police. If you were brown and had no ID, you went straight to the cell," he said.

This was common treatment.

"I was one of the people stopped on the road by a group of cops on K Road," Mr Tolafoa said.

"And I asked one of them why they stopped us and I was asked for my passport. And I thought that's the kind of thing they did in Nazi Germany, they ask for your passport. I said, 'Look, I was born in New Zealand, I don't usually carry my passport around in my back pocket because I'm not travelling anywhere'."

Social outreach

Social worker Vince Tuimaloa, who was part of the youth arm of the Panthers, said the group ran food co-ops and homework centres - and many legal and educational community initiatives were born out of its work.

Mr Tuimaloa said it also advocated for tenants before the existence of the Tenancy Tribunal.

"You were looking at landlords who were charging astronomical rates for houses that were substandard," he said.

"When somebody complained, they got the heavies in to move them out and they might have fixed the window but charged double the amount which the first tenants were complaining about."

Polynesian Panther Party member Vince Tuimaloa, promoting the Samoan culture. Photo: Facebook

Mr Tuimaloa's mother was a Polynesian Panther member and helped create the Pacific Island Resource Centre, which he said then spawned language sites and media outlets.

Auckland University's Mefari Ana also joined the movement, and wrote a number of books on Pacific issues - including works on the Polynesian Panthers.

Dr Ana said it played an important role in asserting New Zealand's multi-cultural identity.
"Of course the Māori who are tagata whenua, that was really embedded in New Zealand identity," she said.

"But we being the first kind of ethnic groups in large numbers that came over - the Panthons kind of set the scene for our Pacific identity, and that we had every right to be here and to be part of a society and not be subject to racism and discrimination."

Dr Mesi Moore said the Panthers joined the struggle by Māori for recognition of Te Reo and for Māori land rights, including the historic protest at Barton Point.

They stood strongly with Māori over the Crown's treatment of them and their rights, she said.

"If they weren't going to do it for Māori, then they definitely weren't going to do it for the Islanders," he said.

"That was a platform that we looked at: OK, if you promise to buy a cake to the Māori, let's see the cake - don't turn around and make excuses why you can't bring the cake, you can't make the cake."

Relevant today

Rev Véryne Tolenfoa said there was still a need for Pacific activism and advocacy 45 years later.

"There still needs to be people that look at things like homelessness and not only look at our people but look at all New Zealanders and think 'why are these people homeless and how can I help them?""

"There's always going to be things that the Panthers were interested in that all New Zealanders should be interested in," Mr Tolenfoa said.

Despite that need, Mr Tolenfoa said his children were fortunate to not have had to face what his generation did.

Sever Polynesian Panther Party members - including Dr Mesi Moore, left, and Mrs Ineretai Sulu Ninoi, centre. Photo: Nicole

Dr Mesi Moors agreed that times had changed. Back then, they couldn't walk down the street without experiencing some kind of racism, she said.

"It was something that we had to face, like it or not, whereas today the Pacific youth are confused about racism," Dr Aue said.

"They don't know what it is, where it lives and how to recognize it because it is not blatantly in their face like it was for us.

"It is more kind of hidden if you like, in terms of institutional racism, political correctness; all these processes that generally are masking the real motive behind power."

Rev Manu Strickson-Pus said he believed the spirit of the Polynesian Panthers would give birth to a new urban Pacifica movement.

He spoke of a history that had given Pacifica a foundation, which said "we are allowed to be political, we are allowed to speak out about injustice".

Will 'Ilaahi and Vince Tuisaua were planning to meet with a group of Pacific and Micronesian activists in Palmerston North over the weekend.

This next generation was a source of much pride, Mr 'Ilaahi said, and he also very proud of the group's literal offspring.

Musicians Ladii, Scree and Chu Lu - as well as All Blacks Ben Atiga and Benson Stanley - are among just a few Pacifica achieving who had parents involved in the movement.

http://www.nzherald.co.nz/national/maori-news/article.cfm?c_id=1&objectid=6023422