Covid-19: Australia announces trans-Tasman bubble flights

8:41 pm on 2 October 2020

The Australian government says it has finalised a deal for a limited travel bubble across the Tasman, but New Zealand PM Jacinda Ardern says the country is still not ready to have quarantine-free travel.

Prime Minister Scott Morrison said he spoke to his New Zealand counterpart Jacinda Ardern earlier today.

Announcing the news across the Tasman, Deputy Prime Minister Michael McCormack said stage 1 of a travel zone with New Zealand would see quarantine-free travel into New South Wales and the Northern Territory.

"This is the first stage in what we hope to see as a trans-Tasman bubble between the two countries not just that state and that territory," he said.

itional Party leader Judith Collins said it seemed clear New Zealanders will be able to go to some Australian states but when they come back they will have to go into quarantine so some will just stay there longer and Australians will not be able to come here.

"Tourism in New Zealand, domestic tourism, will also suffer if those people with the disposable income are going to go to Australia and spend their money there and then say 'I might as well stay for three months while New Zealand sorts itself out' - of course we're going to lose more business."

Collins said pushing a travel bubble with Pacific countries is an obvious thing to do, but it's not feasible until a border protection agency is in place and safety can be assured.

It's important to ensure that New Zealand does not export Covid-19 to places like Samoa, she says.

Tourism Industry Aotearoa chief executive Chris Roberts told Checkpoint the policy was a "crack in the door".

"Someone might want to buy a one-way ticket to Australia to reunite with family but no-one's going to hop on a plane and go for a weekend's shopping in Sydney and come back into two weeks' isolation in New Zealand," Roberts said.

"It's the first development of opening up the Tasman, but it's fairly inconsequential."

Roberts said he think internal Australian politics is behind the announcement.

"The federal government in Australia and the government of New South Wales are working together to put pressure on the other Australian states to open up, because there are still barriers to travel from state to state in Australia. What they really want is for all of Australia to open up. New Zealand is sort of being used to get that to happen.

"In a way we're happy to be used because it starts the conversation. We can start having talk about how that safe travel can happen. But until we can have isolation-free travel on both sides of the Tasman it's not going to make a big difference.

"We think once we get past the election we can have some further discussions between the two governments, hopefully the borders can open in a proper fashion before Christmas."
